HISTORY

Harcourt Street first appears on maps of Dublin in 1784, shortly before no. 9 was built.

Built in c. 1785, 9 Harcourt Street was built by Michael Stapleton, who was considered Ireland's most skilled stuccodor at the time. The property boasts Stapleton's famous stucco ornament throughout. The current owners completed a renovation project in recent years, sensitively restoring the building resulting in an exceptional contemporary fit out.

The exterior of the property was built in a simpler fashion with the exception of the iconic doorway and overhead fan light. Since its construction 240 years ago, the building is understood to have been home to only two tenants.

DESCRIPTION

The building is a four storey over basement former Georgian townhouse extending to approximately 5,121 sq. ft. Comprising a mix of large open plan rooms and smaller cellular offices, particularly on the upper floors, the building is ideal for all tenant types. There are ample facilities throughout including multiple kitchenettes and WC facilities. The shower facilities, located throughout the building, have been finished to the highest standard. The ceilings range in height up to four metres with large sash windows allowing natural light to fill the rooms.

To the rear is a large return which covers ground to second floor. This space provides open plan office space as well as tenant amenities including kitchenette and bathroom facilities.

The building has been recently renovated and repainted throughout, with works including the installation of modern lighting fixtures, which amplify the impressive plasterwork.

The large basement provides additional office space as well as a comms room, kitchenette, and shower facilities along with underfloor heating.

A large secure yard contains parking for up to 8 cars and is accessed via Montague Lane to the rear.
